Intrinsic Motivation Definition

Intrinsic motivation is defined as the internal drive that originates from within the individual, rather than from external influences. It is the motivation to engage in an activity for its intrinsic value, or the pleasure derived from the activity itself, rather than for any external rewards or recognition. This type of motivation is more durable and can lead to greater enjoyment and sustained effort in the activity. It is distinct from extrinsic motivation, which is driven by external factors such as rewards, recognition, or avoiding punishment.
